The Internet Needs Policing

David Talbot

David Talbot is a chief correspondent for Technology Review. He held a Knight Science Journalism Fellowship at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) in 1999–2000 and has had a long career as a newspaper reporter. Talbot has received numerous awards for journalism, including honors from the Overseas Press Club of America and the International Press Association.

There are basic problems in the fundamental design of the Internet. Originally intended as a simple communications network, the Internet has grown to include complicated new technology. The addition of this technology has resulted in more opportunities for malicious attacks. Security holes have been filled with software patches, but there are now so many different patches that it is almost impossible to keep track of them all. The focus on keeping the Internet safe for everyone has taken time away from the creation of innovative new features and applications. A better, safer, more secure global network is needed.

The Internet has wrought wonders: e-commerce has flourished, and e-mail has become a ubiquitous means of communication. Almost one billion people now use the Internet, and critical industries like banking increasingly rely on it. At the same time, the Internet's shortcomings have resulted in plunging security and a decreased ability to accommodate new technologies. "We are at an inflection point, a revolution
